

Congress Should "Sit In"

When representatives of some forty-odd nations meet in Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in July, to consider such a ponderous matter as a global monetary policy, Congress, both houses, should have their delegates on hand to participate.

The fact that the President did not include Congress when issuing invitations to the parley is typical of the way things are being run in Washington where it is becoming increasingly more stylish to have one man settle all problems for 130,000,000 people.

The creation of a monetary policy for the world after the war is serious business. If it is to be endorsed by America, the duly elected representatives of the people—Senators and Congressmen—should be present to express their views and to serve as an emergency brake in the event that foreign representatives should become too enthusiastically interested in taking over Mr. Morgenthau's building.

The application of the democratic principles demands that Congress should participate in all preliminary hearings on matters of such scope and importance.
